Higher house price growth in nonmetropolitan areas is credit positive for Dutch RMBS

On 21 August, the Dutch national statistics bureau (Centraal Bureau voor de Statistiek, or CBS) published updated house price data for the Netherlands for the second quarter of 2019. The data show continued growth of house prices at slightly decreasing rates compared with previous quarters across the Netherlands. However, for the first time since 2015, house prices in provinces with higher proportions of underwater mortgages increased at a faster pace than in provinces with lower proportions of underwater mortgages. Relatively higher house price growth in regions with more underwater borrowers is credit positive for Dutch RMBS.

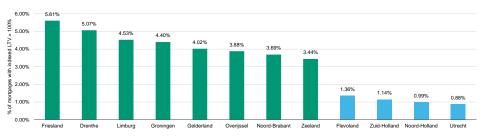

Borrowers with underwater mortgages (mortgages with indexed loan-to-value ratios in excess of 100%) have no equity stake in their properties, and therefore tend to have higher default frequencies. In addition, defaults on underwater mortgages have higher loss severities because the foreclosure proceeds are insufficient to repay the loan amount, resulting in a loss for Dutch RMBS transactions.

The proportion of underwater mortgages differs substantially between provinces, as shown by our analysis of loan-level data for 65 currently outstanding Dutch RMBS transactions (Exhibit 1). We classify a province as "highly leveraged" if the proportion of underwater mortgages exceeds 3% (green columns in Exhibit 1). We consider provinces "less leveraged" if the proportion of underwater mortgages is below 3% (blue columns in Exhibit 1).

price growth in more leveraged provinces. The difference between the growth rates started to narrow in the fourth quarter of 2018, and reversed in the second quarter of 2019 (Exhibit 2).

We expect Dutch house prices to continue to increase nationwide, although at lower rates than in the past several years. Nonmetropolitan areas have more growth potential, supporting the credit-positive trend for Dutch mortgage pools. As shown in Exhibit 3, the house price growth trajectory is more stable in non-metropolitan provinces such as Friesland and Drenthe, whereas the sharp price increase in major metropolitan provinces Noord-Holland and Zuid-Holland is tapering off.
